AN OLDEN MEMORY

to have the headache, innocently mention thawb as left something undone, & a performance of which would not have involved much hard labour, and you will soon find his out. That you will be delighted at the discovery is not likely, but at the same time you are sure to feel that you would be considered a brute if you returned his unreasonable display of irritation in kind, and so restrain your feelings.

After the first attack, bestow additional attention on him on account of his ill-humour, which you lay to the score of the maladies that afflict him, rather than to that innate perversity of nature which he has done his best to cherish. Thus, he is not encouraged to cease wringing himself up in himself, while he is ill, for he is sure to continue in the belief that he is a poor, suffering martyr, who should be the recipient of sympathy at all hands, albeit that he selfishly has no tender thought for mortals who are much more afflicted than himself. Let him, then, be taught that he does not stand alone, and he would be at a loss to know how to a little less, and that because a man fancies himself to be a tender heart he has no right to constitute himself an infliction upon society and a burden to his friends. Treated thus, he might in nine cases out of ten discover that, after all, he enjoyed fair health. We are encouraged to believe this because many habitual "weak" invalids, notwithstanding their sufferings, contrive to live to a "good old age."—Liberal Review.

It is the special function of women to captivate. Consequently, when they cease to smile they drop their legitimate rôle. Passion may be very noble and impressive, but it does not seem to sit lustily upon most of them. Possibly it added fuel to the brave Joan of Arc, and there are one or two living actresses who can imitate it successfully upon the stage, but the great bulk of our actresses is not of a grandly noble type. On the contrary, it is mostly decidedly petty character. Perhaps, it is most petty when it is of most hysterical. When an ordinary woman, inspired by intense feeling, attempts to soar into the region of heroism she generally ends by making a sorry exhibition of herself. Playgoers sympathize with Leah, and applaud her unpolished but very few persons sympathize with her in her rage, in her rage, becomes a more tremendous. They recoil from her strong language, even though it may be justifiable, and they feel that she is showing the worst side of her nature. Now, as passion is not always in itself objectionable—may, is sometimes grand and of incalculable service—women may think themselves entitled to use in raising looked. When they are in a storm and rain, they may want to know why they are so treated. The truth appears to be that generally they display what may be called tempestuous irritability rather than concentrated passion, and that the violence of their outbursts is not justified by the causes thereof. Nor is this surprising, for in the humdrum life of the English in the nineteenth century there is little room for passion. Apart from the occasional man who commits horrible murders, and the fools who befuddle their wits away and then batter their wives, there are few whose careers do not flow on evenly from day to day. There may not plenty of comedy

...most kind of politics. Still, though, she every word: "Kiss of gratitude."

 "is so very delicious, that it contrives to roll itself off of some poor creature's tongue as a matter of course; and it is a most important character; and it is a most important circumstance, that she considered as her own way and prevents many other things from leaving theirs. The particular in which she resembles the strikers is her perversity." Now, the person who is fired by a grand passion never loses sight of the cause thereof, and over displays a sated passion. Most hungry ladies, however, do not know what they want. They have no ultimatum, their concession of which will lead to a cessation of hostilities. They strike and whine merely in order to: ease their feelings and wound their opponents—Liberal Review.

somewhere between the 14th and the 15th centuries stood the premises of Kanabek and Perib; builders and contractors. The yard with its workshops forming part of one of those former lines between many business and domestic dwellings that occur in what are called the poorer neighbourhoods. We are accustomed to regard industrial districts as having no greenery, progress, its well-known signs greeting our eyes on every outlook. Such places may be seen turning into pleasant kitchens; a broad cascade of shattered earthenware smothering piles of building materials; bushes and vegetable gardens growing close to the sloping upland where the householder may be expected to find his manure spread from overlooked potato-ribs through the cracks of his cellar-floor. But the other great check, that of infra-transformation, is less curious than this encroachment of grey, ugly things upon the greenness of the milk-thresh of suburb, and as the district rises in dignity they are dislodged by those which are more enduring. Sluggishness becomes supplanted by comparative solidity, commonness by novelty, lowness and irregularity by symmetry and height.—Cornell Magazine.

~~a spare bedchamber, seldom used, while~~

You would like to carpet at little expense. Go to the paper-hanger's store and select a paper looking as nice as you can find. Then, when you take it home, first paper the floor of your bedroom with brown paper or newspapers. Then over this or by itself put down your wall paper. A good way to do this will be to put a good coat of paste upon the width of the roll of paper and the length of the room and then lay down, unrolling and smoothing at the same time. When the floor is all covered, it will turn varnish-like and will be as strong as glass. The varnish-like material may be used, and the floor will look all the better for the darkening, these will give it. When it is dry, put down a few rugs by the bedside and before the toilet table, and you have as pretty a carpet as you could wish. A carpet, too, that will last for years, is not subject to constant wear and at a trifling extra cost will give your room the look of a summer prepared in the best way. It is used constantly, and when the house was sold in the fall, the purchaser asked me to take up the oilcloth, as they wished to make some alterations which you would be sure to injure it.

stood Cardinal Antonelli—a man who would not escape observation in any assembly notable persons. If the Inquisition should be revived in its early genial form, the reader should fall into its hands, as would very likely be the case, if a man of the type of the country gentleman could be so nearly comfortable if his obsequious had so cold and subtle a countenance as Cardinal Antonelli. We occasionally meet in political or in social life men whose presence seems to be an anathema to the soul belonging to a type so fanciful and so unworldly as the country gentleman, the naturalist, though perhaps not without great an enthusiasm. Cardinal Antonelli in his bearing and the cast of his countenance, had that air of remoteness which impresses us in the works of the old masters. I had seen somewhere a head of Velasquez for which the artist had been paid, and for which the subject had been brought up from his tomb through the country light upon him through the deep-set window, seemed like some cruel patient escaped from one of the earlier volumes of Frobenius's History of England,—subtle, haughty, and intolerant. I did not mean to allow so minor an impression to remain on my mind, and all I have since read and heard of Cardinal Antonelli has only been gradually obliterated as I have been biographically struck given this "thou shalt of the cardinal." "He is a man of unbending disposition, a zealous conservative, and a strenuous opponent of the invading spirit of the age. His manners are cold, reserved, and little calculated to make him popular, but his intellect is strong, religious, and political. The character of a Cardinal of Rome is great, and is supported by a remarkable energy and strength of character. His personal appearance is striking and imposing, impressing all who come in contact with him. He is distinguished by a keen intellect for which he is distinguished. It was a pleasure to turn from the imposing prime minister of the present to the imposing personage of his august master, with small, sparkling eyes, remarkably piercing, and smiling nose the less winsome that it lighted up a mouth denoting unusual force of will. His face was not at all the face of a man who had passed nearly half a century in a world of diplomatic and court scenes. His face indicated a stern, the face of a man who had led a temperate, blameless, private life, noble contrast to many of his prefigured predecessors, whom the world was only glad to have snugly stowed away in the gorgeous purple coffins with a marble and a black carved stop. Giovanni Mastai-Ferretti, the Pope, was a Sicilian, and was born in 1792; the week previous to this reception had celebrated his eightieth birthday; but he did not look over sixty-five or seventy, as he stood there in a cream-white skullcap of broadcloth and a long pontifical robe of the same material, a costume that lent an appearance of being to an undergarment of white flannel, and a skullcap, and his strongly-shaven pale face a trifling here, perhaps because of the doubt, to be a very beautiful old man. After pausing a moment or two in the middle of the chamber, and taking a bird's-eye glance at his guests, the Pope, smiling and benignly, addressed them in Italian, and then turned to the nearest cardinal to perform the duties of a foreigner. His Holiness spoke French. After a few words of salutation gave his hand to each person, who took it with his lips or his forehead, or sometimes retained it as an instant. It was a delicate hand, on the forehead, and it was a great deal of long, leathery, spotted fingers, and the Pope was so slowly and slowly caught at the hand of his robe and pressed it to their lips, and most instances bowed down and kissed the feet. I suppose it was only by recurring practice that his Holiness was able to keep on a nose here and there. After Monthly
